

Call For Papers:
“Revisiting Remaking Modernity:
New Voices in Comparative-Historical Sociology”

Ten years after the publication of the landmark edited volume Remaking Modernity (Duke 2005), the time is ripe to take stock of comparative-historical sociology’s past, present and future. The ASA Section on Comparative-Historical Sociology, the Northwestern University Department of Sociology, and Northwestern University’s Buffett Institute for Global Studies are pleased to announce a mini-conference entitled “Revisiting Remaking Modernity: New Voices in Comparative-Historical Sociology,” to take place at Northwestern University in Evanston, IL on August 21st (one day before the annual ASA meeting in downtown Chicago is to begin).

The conference will include an opening plenary panel featuring the editors of Remaking Modernity—Julia Adams, Elisabeth Clemens, and Ann Shola Orloff—in conversation with scholars in the early stages of their careers.

In keeping with the book’s embrace of interdisciplinary perspectives that take culture, agency, and institutions seriously, we are particularly interested in submissions that bring comparative and historical approaches to bear on the following topics: race and ethnicity; gender; religion and religious extremism; sex and sexuality; social movements/collective action; colonialism and post-colonialism; labor; the environment and environmental protection; and the Global South.

We welcome submissions from scholars at all career stages. As one aim of the conference is to bring comparative-historical sociology into fruitful dialogue with other areas of sociology, we encourage submissions from scholars from outside the subfield.

Please submit one-page abstracts to Barry Eidlin (eidlin@work.rutgers.edu) and Elisabeth Anderson (aeander@u.northwestern.edu) by Friday, April 3rd. Conference participants and attendees will be asked to contribute a participation fee ($25 for faculty, $15 for students) to help defray meeting costs.